I remember Windows or OS X (whatever it was called) from the mid-2000s and it has a system image that basically is an exact copy of your current OS. [?] It's worth noting that Windows (and perhaps Linux) OS often include system images on the live cd/dvd that is shipped with the product. The image is basically a pre-built copy of the system that is used to make sure that the new system works with the existing hardware without requiring reinstallation, and other pre-built software that can be used for testing and verifying the install. Basically the difference is that a system image is a copy of your current OS
