The DBA system is the number one system for recreating. This past weekend I attended a workshop hosted by the Society of American Archivists (SAA) and the Organization of American Historians (OAH) on the archival use of Facebook. I'm told that it was a success, and I would concur. Sarah Shapiro and Steven Newman of the SAA presented, moderated a panel that included Jonathan Hansen and Guy Cowan of the OAH and I. The workshop was a two-part series. The first part was called "Archiving Your Facebook Pages: The Web 2.0 Way." The second part was called "Archiving Your Facebook Pages: The Traditional Way," which was being presented by a different group: the Digital Imaging and Preservation (DIP) Group. SAA and OAH The first presentation, an overview of how to best archive one's Facebook pages, came from Sarah Shapiro, program manager of archival science at the SAA. She covered the five main steps in archiving one's Facebook account: selecting a format, choosing a storage medium, creating a description, cataloging, and performing access and use restrictions. She discussed the need to select a particular Facebook format (JPG or PNG), the importance of metadata, and how to store "community" in a way that makes sense for archiving. She also discussed Web 2.0 and the new possibilities that it brings to the process. Although she didn't make a direct reference to it, it's hard to imagine a more appropriate use of this presentation than to provide examples of best practices for archiving one's Facebook account. The second presentation on Facebook archiving came from Steve Newman of the Society of American Archivists. He discussed the "traditional" ways of archiving one's Facebook account, and how to implement them. Steve, who has his own website and blog, has been documenting his experience with Facebook archiving, and especially archiving the pages of his 3e33713323
